I understand that the original way of covering the steering wheels involved a mould i.e. the wheel was covered with the chosen substance (celluloid ?) and then the wheel was put in a mould to "cure".

I dont think that a mould is used nowadays by the steering wheel "restorers".

I have a funny feeling that the modern "restoration process" for steering wheels is no different to the system I have used - this maybe the reason why Colin said that the "restorer" did not want to share details of the process with him !

I maybe wrong of course so any other ideas from anyone else would be interesting !
